May 10th, 2020 - Early and personal life

Bellamy was born in London to parents Winifred May née Green and Thomas Bellamy on 18 January 1933. He was raised in a Baptist family and retained a strong Christian faith throughout his life. As a child, he had hoped to be a ballet dancer but he concluded that his rather large physique precluded him from pursuing the occupation. He attended Battersea Polytechnic Institute and later became a biology teacher. He was also involved in the National Trust. In his early years, Bellamy was a keen cyclist and still enjoys cycling today.

Bellamy is known for his love of nature and wildlife conservation. He has been an advocate for environmental causes and has written numerous books on the subject. He has also appeared on television and radio shows, sharing his knowledge and passion for the natural world. Bellamy's work has been widely recognized and he has received numerous awards for his contributions to conservation. He continues to be an active campaigner and remains an influential voice in the conservation movement.
